

Fran's Tune: written for a friend's wedding; it involves the set piece development of a "new" idea through four parts, each stage emerging logically from the previous one but none, hopefully, to anticipated conventional conclusions. An example of the open ended nature of composition. Few things are ever finally completed; a version was played at the wedding but it took twenty years to get it all.