

A WORD TO THE

the "Concluding Remarks" in the "Treatise on the "Scots Highland" by the same author gives some very excellent advice. He says :—" Avoid dawdling and musing. A Lament, a Salute as a Salute, a March. The tendency is rather to play the player should first form his estimate of the music and render it accordingly. He should strive for Piobaireachd. He should strive for strict and mathematical correctness. He should find and give expression without any affectation. What causes, above all, loitering on the E of the GED cadence. The double beat on A.

It should be remembered that the introduction is, in itself, merely an introductory remark, in itself, themal. Therefore, it must not detract from the introduction, and should not in any case. The double beat on A should not on any account be rushed and indicate. This rushing of the E of the GED cadence often for the rhythmic swing of a tune on A by the omission of the cadence must be distinctly heard to complete of a correctly played cadence. It should be observed that when a long A to complete the bar, the and the longest accent on the f on the last. This view is correct. Treatise on the "Scots Highland" it is generally necessary in the played by the same note to complete the note of the double beat being given more time.
