

Society's recent publication gives four versions of the song: first, Donald MacDonald's; third, Angus MacNeilly's, one and all, most excellent examples of the "regularity" of the music. To recognise, apparently, the absolute "principle of "regularity" governs the arrangement of the notes apparent in the various versions. The Society's version is the timing, i.e., the duration of certain notes or movements to bring them into the time which they have been allotted. For instance, in the first two, 2, 5 and 3 are affixed, we find the notes on F and E, and yet these movements are not in the Society's version, thus—

It is sufficient evidence of incorrectness.

If further evidence is necessary, compare the fifth version of the movements referred to stand out clearly that the bar marks are wrongly placed in the Society's version. The last two notes of the movement are thus—
